Tomskaya Pisanitsa Park, Kemerovo

Andy Croft

‘we all matter, we are all indelible, miraculous, here’.
(Julia Darling)

for Dasha

1
We take a break from our discussions
About the British poetry scene.
About time too; I’ve bored these Russians
Quite long enough now. In between
Each post-New Gen New Generation
And last week’s latest new sensation,
I have the sense they’re not impressed.
Oh dear. Although I tried my best,
When every poet is ‘dark’ and ‘daring’,
Each new collection ‘vibrant’, ‘bold’
And last year’s new is this year’s old,
The sum effect is somewhat wearing.
There’s rather more to art, I fear,
Than simply saying, I was here.
Tomskaya Pisanitsa Park, Kemerovo

2
We take the bus across the river.
Beneath the wide Kuznetsky Bridge
They’re fishing on the ice. We shiver.
It would be warmer in a fridge.
We’re driving North, past roadside diners,
The monument to Kuzbass miners,
The forest blur of greys and browns,
And summer-dacha shantytowns,
Scaletrix roads and lego churches.
The bus slows down. At last we’re there.
We stop among the silent glare
And tinsel glitter of the birches
(I borrowed this line from a verse
By Mandelshtam – it could be worse).

3
Ten minutes later, we’re stood gazing
In frozen silence at these cliffs –
A frieze of hundreds of amazing
Six thousand year old petroglyphs
That stretch from Dürer-like cross-hatches
To etch-a-sketchish childish scratches.
Abraided, nicked and tricked and picked,
These scrawls upon the walls depict
A pre-Deluvian procession
Of aurochs, foxes, wolves and deer,
A hunter with a pointy spear
(Or handy-stick). Sod self-expression –
It seems to me all art starts from
These pictograms beside the Tom.
The Sympathetic Magic thesis
(See Abbé Breuil, of Lascaux fame)
Proposed that it was through mimesis
That we first taught ourselves to name
And tame the growling world with patterns;
That art expands the things it flattens;
That humankind first found its tongue
When rhythmic gesture, dance and song
Marked out the grunter from the grunting;
That knocking matter into shape’s
What separates us from the apes;
And that the hunted started hunting
When we began to imitate
Creation’s hunger on a plate.

Imagined goals are scored by winners –
Once caught by art upon these rocks
These animals were Sunday dinners,
A winter coat, a pair of socks.
No need to shiver by the river
When art’s enchantments can deliver
A woolly vest to keep you warm.
A pelt fits like a well-made form,
A birthday suit (but less informal),
A fur-lined cloak in which to hide
And keep the hungry world outside,
A second skin that feels, well, normal.
In short, when we first borrowed fur,
The human soup began to stir.
The world out there is strange and formless,
A wilderness of blood and force –
Art’s job’s to make it seem less gormless
(From gaumr, ‘lacking sense’ – Old Norse).
These primitive caricaturists
Were never art-for-art’s-sake purists;
Their work was useful as an axe,
Each rock-engraving made the facts
Of Neolithic dreams still bigger.
Above the bison, bears and birds
The stick-men chasing reindeer herds,
There seems to be a flying figure
Among the stars and solar rings:
A human with a pair of wings.

Cue Kubrik’s famous match-cut edit
As trumpets fanfare to the dawn:
A handy tool with which to credit
The narrative of brain and brawn
(An always useful combination)
That saw us conquer all creation
And take our place among the stars.
Leonov’s weightless boots were ours.
But you can’t space-walk like a model
Or take your partner in the waltz
Unless you know which steps are false;
Before a child can learn to toddle,
As someone said, you need the knack
Of sometimes taking one step back.
This Kemerovo conurbation
Was built by US Reds with dreams;
They came at Lenin’s invitation
To drain the coal-rich Kuzbass seams
Which Kolchak’s Whites had lately flooded,
They stayed four years, and worked and studied
Till Comrade One-Crutch learned to fly
And Big Bill Heywood’s good left eye
Could see that they had half-created
A Wobbly city in the sticks.
But then in 1926,
The colony was ‘liquidated’
And History wiped the record clean,
Almost as if they’d never been.

Just like the old Siberian Yeti
Whose hairy footprints in the snow
Get journalists all hot and sweaty
At forty-five degrees below;
Though sightings are reported yearly
The cynics say that they are merely
A troupe of circus bruins who
Escaped from some old Soviet zoo,
Deciding that unspoken freedom
Sounds better than the world's applause.
The Park’s bears, meanwhile, show their claws
To Sunday visitors who feed ‘em
Their honeyed wages through the bars
That separate their world from ours.
In Bear Rock cave a single finger
Is all that’s left of some lost race
Who lacked, perhaps, the art to linger
Before they vanished without trace;
Perhaps they never learned to fashion
The world to get their morning ration;
Or else they lacked the wherewithal
To read the writing on the wall
That spelled out their abrupt extinction.
These folk were here. And now they’ve gone.
Like sabre-tooth and mastodon.
The hungry world makes no distinction
Between the beasts on which we prey
And those to which we ought to pray.

But evidence of evolution’s
A kind of messy palimpsest –
These rocks include some contributions
By later artists (Ya bil zdes) –
To wit, although we think we’re brainier
We can’t shake off the graphomania
We caught six thousand years ago
(Like writers pissing in the snow).
These bare rocks mark the clumsy stages
By which we make our slow ascent;
All art can do is represent
Our progress on their uncut pages
Before we each must disappear,
By simply saying, we were here.
Notes
This sequence was written while teaching briefly at the University of Kemerovo, in Siberia, in 2010. The Tomskaya Pisanitsa Park is a few miles outside the city, famous for a series of Neolithic rock-carvings on the banks of the river Tom. Alexei Leonov, the first human to walk in space, was born in Kemerovo. Comrade One-Crutch is the title of the children’s novel about Kemerovo by the US writer Ruth Epperson Kennell. Bear Rock Cave is south of Kemerovo in the Altai Krai, the site of the recent discovery of ‘Woman X’ or the ‘Denisova Hominin’. This sequence was first published in Kuzbass XXI Vek, March 2011.